Interview with Omer Pasha

describes an interview with the Ottoman General

A correspondent of one of the London daily papers

Omer Pasha sat on the divan, near the fire, with a long chibouk by his side, and surrounded by papers and letters. At a respectful distance were two or three Pachas, also with pipes, which, however, in accordance with Turkish official etiquette, they never touched until their superior had set them the example. He at once entered in conversation in French, which he speaks fluently, but with rather a strong German accent. Italian is his forte. The first thing that struck me on seeing him was the singular ingenuity displayed by the French and English artists who have undertaken to render his features familiar to the European public, in making their portraits so very unlike the original. Any of them that had come under my notice would serve just as well for the memorials of the Emperor of China or the Czar Nicholas, as of Omer Pacha. But independently of the false impressions which they had left on my mind, I must confess that I found it somewhat difficult to realise the idea that I was actually in the presence of the redoubtable chief whose name has been on every tongue for the last six months. Take away the huge mustachios, which half conceal his mouth, and the gray beard beneath it, and you might fancy at first glance yourself talking to a "fine old English gentleman, who had never performed any more warlike exploit than running down a fox. There is a kindly good humored gleam in his eye, an honest candor, which puts you at your ease, because you feel that he is sonot merely a rude soldiery frankness, but an approach to bonhommie, though without the smallest want of dignity. On a longer acquaintance you discover that the outlines of his face bear the impression of Herculean energy, and even of audacity, and there is a massiveness about the wrinkles, even, that nothing save a fierce struggle with time could have produced. In moments of excitement, when his eyes flash under the cover of his eyebrows, and as they sometimes do even in ordinary conversation, his appearance reminds though when speaking on the subject with an Englishman he shows some diffidence in pronouncing an opinion, and generally throws his remarks into an intershows in grappling with Russia now, is but postponing the struggle to a period when she will find herself less prepared for it, and will perhaps have to meet it alone; for he does not entertain a doubt that two powers representing principles so opposite to one an-

The Destinies of Europe-The Action of the German Powers.

The destinies of Europe hang upon the decision of two great German powers. Will the cabinets of Vienna and Berlin unite themselves heartily and sincerely with the French and British governments for the maintenance of the existing territorial arrangements of Europe. If this be so, there is even yet a possibility that the hostilities already begun upon a section of the Danube may not rise to the proportions of a general war. The point at issue is, in reality, one of far more immediate moment to the German sovereigns than to the Western Powers. Let us speak of each in turn. One of the principal objects which the Russian Emperor now seeks to realise is the conquest of the mouths of the Danube-in other words, he desires to seal up the principal outlet for the commerce of the Austrian dominions. Now, the Danube is an Austrian river-for all practical puroses, as much so as the Rhone is a French or the Thames an English river. Of course the Austrian Cabinet is amused with propositions for indemnification, but it would be just as possible to indemnify the Emperor Francis Joseph for the loss of his head, as it would be to compensate his subjects for the loss of the Danube. The Austrian should rejoice to see Europe rising in arms to fight a battle peculiarly his own. We dismiss the hypothesis of neutrality as unworthy of serious notice, should the struggle assume a character of reality. Before two months of war are over every Power in Europe, with the exception possibly of Spain, will be engaged on one de or the other. Let us assume for a moment that Austria should side with Russia, and with all the other German governments, against France and Engand, against the population of Germany, of Hunga-

Surely Lombardy would make herself heard once more, and with effective allies the result might be very different. Let us ask the councilors of Francis Joseph to consider what the effect would be if some 50,000 Frenchmen should cross the Lombard frontier six weeks hence, and a fleet manned with English blue jackets, should support their operations on either coast of the Peninsula? Would it cost the two government much pain to set Italy on fire at the four corners? Hungary and Poland remain: but we do not think . the Austrian cabinet can derive much satisfaction from the contemplation of those provinces, if their discontent were backed by Western Europe. On minor points, such as the fate of Trieste and Venice, in case of a war between Austria and the naval Powers, we need not dwell, but would leave the case in its full simplicity for the consideration of the house of Hapsburg. After all, why is the young Emperor bound to the triumphant sledge of the Czar? The Hungarian operations in which the Russian army was engaged were under taken far more for the Emperor Nicholas's own security than for that of the dominions of Francis Joseph .-The campaign which the Russan Generals conducted in Hungary they must otherwise have conducted in other cannot subsist side by side without a collision, Russian Poland. In saving Hungary to the house of Hapsburg, they saved the European provinces of their own master. Such is the simple statement of Austria's obligations to Russia; but we have yet to learn that questions of sentiment can be permitted to influence the decisions of a great government. To these considerations we would add, that if by siding with the other European Powers the Austrian monarch should succeed in making war impossible to the Russians, he will have saved the Emperor Nicholas from destruction and his empire from dismemberment. Surely this is the best proof of gratitude which could be given in return for service performed.

Lave Affair of Benedict Arnold's. The following is a veritable letter, written by General Benedict Arnold, enclosing one to Miss Deblois of Boston. It was addressed to Mrs. General Knox who was then residing in Boston, and was a friend of in Boston, a lady of most respectable standing in soted, and the lady was never married; though tradition says that some time subsequently to the date of this letter, she went so far as to enter the church to be married to a Boston gentleman, and that there the marriage was forbidden by her own mother; for what reason is not known. Miss Deblois lived and died in Boston in single blessedness and high respectability. It will be seen by the impassioned language of Arnold's letter that he made love even as he fought and did everything else-with all his might and main.-And one cannot help reflecting how very different might have been the history of this brave but passionate and ill-principled man, had he succeeded in this, perhaps his first love affair.

At the time he wrote this letter he was perhaps at the zenith of his fame. It was just subsequent to the brilliant career in Canada and along the lakes .-The original letter, in Arnold's own hand writing, ted hand. We have given the spelling and capitalizing as in the original.
